What if firefighters’ gloves could also become their eyes? This is the illuminating idea behind new vibro-tactile gloves developed at the University of Minnesota.

Sensors placed on the back of the hands can detect distant physical structures and shapes, even in a dark or smoky room, giving firefighters a better chance of both finding people, as well as finding their own way out, safely. Discover even more at umn.edu.